The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Islamic State of Afghanistan presents its compliments to His Excellency the Secretary-General of the United Nations and has the honour to present herewith an editorial entitled "Murderous Taliban must not be appeased", by Agence France Presse, dated 3 November 1999 (appendix I) and a news report entitled "Afghan rulers drive 130,000 from homes", dated 20 October 1999, in The Guardian (London) by Barry Bearak (appendix II).

Appendix I

Editorial entitled "Murderous Taleban must not be appeased", by Agence France Press, dated 3 November 1999

IN about two weeks (Nov 19), the United Nations will impose sanctions on Afghanistan's ruling Taleban militia if suspected terrorist Osama bin Laden is not turned over for trial in the United States.

The US government maintains that bin Laden masterminded the twin bombings of its embassies in Kenya and Tanzania last year and wants him deported. The Taleban, which acknowledges the Saudi exile is living in their country, has so far refused to surrender him, citing the lack of an extradition treaty with Washington and an Islamic court hearing that cleared him of any connection to the bombings.

At the same time, the Taleban, which controls 85 per cent of Afghanistan but does not hold a UN seat because of opposition from the US and other countries, has said it is willing to discuss the issue with Washington and made it clear it wants to improve relations with the rest of the world. Over the weekend, bin Laden said he was ready to leave Afghanistan if a sanctuary could be found, suggesting he fears his future is no longer secure in the country.

As evil as bin Laden may be, the UN needs to be wary about offering too much in the way of diplomatic recognition to the Taleban. Since they began their unstoppable march to power in mid-1995 the Taleban have shown themselves to be one of the most viciously repressive regimes in the world. Any deal that surrenders whatever leverage the UN has to use on the Taleban for the sake of bringing one suspected criminal to justice would be a poor trade. Bin Laden is blamed for a handful of terrorist acts. The Taleban has instituted a reign of terror over an entire population.

It is easy to understand Washington's anger and determination to have bin Laden arrested. Its efforts to capture him, take military action against his hideouts, or isolate him internationally have so far ended in frustration and, in the case of the US air force's bombing of a Sudan chemical factory, the deaths of apparently innocent people.

The attacks allegedly plotted by bin Laden are the worst kind of terrorism: blind, senseless crimes of hatred that achieve nothing other than darken the name of Islam. In the embassy attacks, bin Laden's bombers killed hundreds of innocent Africans and a handful of low-level American foreign service workers. Still, his record of destruction pales compared to that of the Taleban who have seized control of a war-ruined country and taken it back 600 years into a medieval nightmare.

They have assassinated political opponents inside and outside the country, isolated the population from the outside world by banning all radios and televisions, and set about destroying all non-Muslim monuments in the country. Their strict interpretation of Islam has been particular hard on women and girls, who cannot leave their homes without a male guardian to accompany them. They are not permitted to work or go to school. They are forbidden from seeing male doctors and as a result women and girls are dying in droves from untreated diseases. Any resistance to the Taleban has been met with savage beatings, mutilations, abductions and murder. Civilians have been shot for being caught with alcohol and yet at the same time Afghanistan's opium trade has flourished under Taleban rule.

Militarily, the militia have committed excesses in a country that has been little more than a battleground for ruthless warlords for the past two decades. In July, after suffering a military setback at the hands of the forces of Ahmad Shah Massoud, their sole remaining opposition, the Taleban militia went on an ethnic-cleansing spree in the Shamali Valley just north of Kabul. Entire towns in the predominantly Tajik and shi'ite areas were levelled, military-aged males were killed, livestock machine-gunned, fruit trees sawn down, and irrigation canals blasted.

The offensive against the civilians sent some 65,000 new refugees to join the 130,000 estimated to be living outside and near Kabul. With winter closing in, a humanitarian crisis is building and yet aid agencies have found nothing but obstructions in their dealings with Taleban leaders.

The capture of bin Laden is an emotional issue in the US and the world would undoubtedly be a safer place if he was locked away. But the UN needs to remain tough in its dealings with the Taleban. The world body has failed miserably in trying to bring peace to the country over the past 21 years and Secretary-General Kofi Annan's latest special peace envoy to the country quit just last month, saying the situation was hopeless.

Much needs to be done to help Afghanistan. Whatever power the UN has to sway the Taleban to improve its appalling human rights record should be used judiciously. For the UN, the issue should be one of priorities.

The Taliban, who want a UN seat, have been killing and burning in their own land

Barry Bearak in Bazarak, eastern Afghanistan

Those who only had their houses burned or crops destroyed often apologise because their story is not bad enough.

They feel sheepish about complaining, so they lead the way to the worse off, the irretrievably broken or the unbearably sorrowful: the children whose parents were killed before their eyes, or men whose wives were carried off screaming.

Or the old woman whose story no one is sure of, who has been sobbing now for two months, fingering a red flower embroidered on a pink cloth.

This is the human wreckage left behind by the binge of blood lust and mayhem unleashed this summer by the Taliban militia who rule Afghanistan, and thousands of Pakistani followers lit with the fervour of supposed jihad.

Killing wantonly, emptying entire towns, machine-gunning livestock, sawing down fruit trees, blasting apart irrigation canals: the destructive spree by the militia is described in consistent detail by witnesses.

Among the survivors are an estimated 65,000 refugees who have escaped to the Panjshir valley, a nape of land nestled in the Himalayan peaks of the Hindu Kush. Huddled in makeshift tents of cloth and plastic, relentlessly foraging for firewood, they are free for now from their tormentors but not yet safe from the furious winds and snows of winter.

The Taliban began their summer offensive in northern Afghanistan on July 28, trying to conquer the only part of the country outside their control.

Their main drive was into the Shamali valley, just north of the capital, Kabul. At least 6,000 soldiers rolled through towns and villages in what survivors call a well-coordinated assault supported by tanks, artillery and air bombardments.

Within a week the Taliban were celebrating victory, only to be stunned by a night counter-attack by opposition forces under Ahmad Shah Massoud.

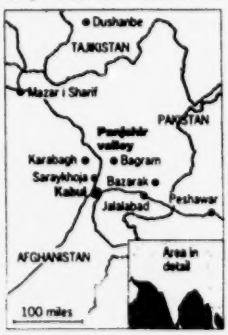
The Massoud forces ambushed and killed hundreds, perhaps more than 1,000, of the Taliban, who went on to suffer even more losses in a disorderly retreat, according to reports. But much of the territory recovered was already in ruin.

Dozens of refugees from Guldara, Bagram, Saraykhoja, Karabagh and other towns to the north of Kabul, interviewed independently, told much the same story: people shot in their homes, fires everywhere, beatings.

"Why did they have to kill my cows and goats, and why cut down the mulberry trees and stomp through my garden?" said Mohammed Kasim, 59. He is now a refugee in the eastern town of Bazarak. His home is a tent of thin blankets held up by branches.

Nafas Jon, 45, a gaunt, tired woman with six children, has taken sanctuary with 1,000 others in Bazarak's decrepit little school. "The Taliban took my husband out of the house and cut him down," she said.

"They were killing everyone who looked young, thinking they must be soldiers. I screamed then, and I cry now. We have nothing left.



"We returned once to see our house," she said, pausing a few seconds to frame the memory in her mind. "The ceiling is now on the ground."

To the victims, the purpose of the Taliban's summer offensive was obvious. The militia is largely made up of ethnic Pathans; they wanted to rid the area of ethnic Tajiks, whose resistance to them has been steadfast, and to leave their enemies with nothing.

Taliban leaders say that their campaign was to save a populace living in constant danger because Commander Massoud's forces, the so-called United Front, used the towns to launch attacks.

To "save" the citizenry, the Taliban forced most to flee; others were trucked to Kabul or the eastern city of Jalalabad.

About 12,500 people — more than 8,000 of them children — are living in the compound of the closed Soviet embassy in Kabul, the UN says. A Massoud official says more than 2,000 Tajik men are locked in the stone caverns of the Pul-i-Charki prison in the city.

There are estimated to be 130,000 refugees in all, the largest concentration in the Panjshir valley. With fighting still going on, the extent of the death and destruction is impossible to measure. Individual accounts are, however, supported by the uniformity of their particulars.

Mohammed Wali, a round-faced boy of 10, poked his head through a crowd to call, "They shot my father, and I saw it."

There had been a hard knocking on their door. His father nervously walked to the gate. Men outside fired Kalashnikovs. With his father dead, he ran inside as fast as he could. His mother, he said, "needed to know about it right away".

Shakar Gul sat on a rock with her arms around her nephew Gules Tan, 3. "His father was killed, and his mother was taken away. He cries out, 'Where is my mother?' We tell him she has gone away but will come back. In time, God willing, he will forget her. New York Times
